Leave a Feedback Project Fileshack.in.This invention is related to an apparatus for equalizing the distribution of cooling air flow through a stack of automotive internal combustion engines. Modern automotive internal combustion engines, particularly those used to power passenger automobiles, are becoming increasingly powerful due to stringent emission requirements. Achieving greater power output requires increased cooling air flow through the engine to dissipate the heat generated by the engine. As a result, large stacks of engine cooling air outlets have been incorporated into the engine compartments of modern passenger automobiles. Typically, these stacks are positioned in direct proximity to the radiator and the air circulated through the radiator cools the stack and releases heat from the stack. Due to variations in automobile design and environmental conditions, not all engine cooling air outlets are provided with the same cooling capacity. Moreover, under certain conditions, some engine cooling air outlets may be completely blocked while others are well supplied with cooling air. Because the engine cooling air outlets are commonly arranged in a stack, it is difficult to separately meter and proportionally distribute the cooling air flow from the stack to the engine cooling air outlets. This results in an inefficient cooling of the engine, particularly during periods of engine inactivity. It is also difficult to monitor the cooling air distribution through the stack. For example, it is not normally possible to determine the current cooling capacity of the cooling air outlets located at the bottom of the stack without stopping the engine. This prevents the automobile operator from being able to determine whether there is a blockage at the bottom of the stack which prevents cooling air from reaching the engine. The present invention is a device for equalizing the distribution of cooling air flow through a stack of automotive engine cooling air
