(AP) — A widespread outbreak of a mosquito-borne virus in the Americas has led to a surge in patients, some of them disabled, with symptoms similar to those of Zika. The New York Times reports that the increase reflects a greater willingness of doctors to test and diagnose, and a greater awareness of the condition. At least one U.S. state has reported nearly 100 cases. ADVERTISEMENT Anthony Fauci of the National Institutes of Health said during a roundtable discussion on Zika that most people who develop a fever and headache within two weeks of a mosquito bite have a flu-like illness. A small percentage of those have more serious symptoms, which last longer. He says the virus is dangerous because it has been associated with birth defects in babies born to women who became pregnant while infected.
